

The Home Office Quiz

Score one point for every statement that's true for you. Two minutes, no diagnosis — just a number.

Answer honestly, not the way you wish it looked. There's no failing grade here — just a starting point, and a free one waiting for you on the other side of it.

- 1 You feel foggier by mid-afternoon than the actual work should explain. ☐
- 2 You've noticed you think more clearly somewhere that isn't your desk — a coffee shop, a different room, outside. ☐
- 3 You couldn't say how many devices are actually running within arm's reach of you while you work. ☐
- 4 A router, printer, or charger sits close enough to touch, and you've never really registered it's there. ☐
- 5 You've never turned off the WiFi on your own computer during a stretch of work that didn't need it. ☐
- 6 Your keyboard, mouse, or headphones are wireless, and you've never thought about whether that matters. ☐
- 7 Your desk backs up to a wall you've never checked for wiring, a breaker panel, or a router on the other side. ☐
- 8 The fatigue you feel at the end of a workday doesn't quite match the physical effort you actually put in. ☐
- 9 You've never tested removing anything from this room to see if it changes how you feel. ☐

Your score: / 9

0–2

Mostly Clear. Nothing here points to much. That doesn't mean this room is spotless — every room carries some baseline hum — just that it's probably not the main thing working against you right now.

3–5

Worth a Look. Something here is worth paying attention to. Not proof of anything specific, but enough of a pattern that it's worth a closer look at what's actually running in that room, not just your own focus or discipline.

6–9

Add It Up. A room this loaded, sat in for eight or nine hours a day, tends to produce exactly the kind of fog and fatigue you might be chalking up to something else. Worth taking seriously — starting with The Free Experiment, not with assuming something's wrong with you.
